US3R624941	03-JAN-21_06:16:04	No.49221	My favourite quote of 2020, and the title of my book, if I could write one is: "You're a doctor, you should know better."
US3R_PREST	03-JAN-21_06:17:23	No.49222	Hah! ^49220 What happened to the 'hospital watch' scheme, by the way? There can't have been a lack of intel?
US3R118578	03-JAN-21_06:19:54	No.49223	^49222 It was too controversial in the end. I think if we had started publishing statements from empty hospitals, and I think it was also talked about juxtaposing these witness reports with statements from the hospitals and health authorities themselves, then it would have been like poking a bear with a stick. The government would have looked so transparently foolish that they would have had to do something. Staff would have been intimidated, cautioned and possibly even arrested, so I think that would have been a bridge too far, in the quest to get the truth out. Can you imagine the amount of police who would have been at each hospital, taking names and enforcing HA non-disclosures? And it would have all been blamed on 'irresponsible people' talking out of turn. Plus it could be used as a further excuse for not tackling 'the pandemic.' You could even use it to bring in worse measures for even longer. When you have the media on your side, you can make up the news as you go along and make any inconvenient facts fit your story. I think the notion of professionals speaking in their own time is still technically legal, although there are factions in and around government who are desperate to keep tabs on any staff who would be 'credible' to the public.
US3R_PREST	03-JAN-21_06:21:17	No.49224	Let's face it the television and newspapers aren't going to be mentioning anything are they, so it'll be the usual 'conspiracy theory' and 'far-right anti-vaxx' slurs. It's just making people more polarised and highlighting ██████████ comment about 'you should know better. because you're a doctor.'
US3R118578	03-JAN-21_06:22:11	No.49225	I think now, you either know or you don't. We've had a year of evidence and common sense. If people don't understand what's happening by now, then I'm afraid it's too late.
