US3R109455	08-MAY-21_09:16:44	No.53124	I've been opposed to the ridicule of the Covid believers because I don't feel it was helpful. People do tend to live down to their reputations, so if you repeatedly tell people they are stupid, they will eagerly prove you right. However, we are at a stage in the Covid operation, approaching two years in, when I think that the messaging has reached saturation. I am of the same opinion as Mike Yeadon, that the crisis point, or inflection point, is probably already here. Those who have bought the narrative and are looking for the government to save them, are too heavily invested in the politics of fear to even listen to the facts. I am leaning toward the notion that these people are indeed 'lost' and there is nothing more that can be done for them. I still don't think they should be ridiculed, but rather ignored as a symptom of collateral damage in this terrible war. The next two 'flu seasons' and their attendant lockdowns, could be the triggers for a change of life on earth that right now we can only speculate about. After that, the Covid believers won't be an issue any more.
US3R620975	08-MAY-21_09:19:12	No.53125	^53124 Wow. I've never heard you speak like that before. Not even 'I could be wrong but...' I've thought we were in a war since the start of this, but maybe we're getting to that turning point where the first assault has made gains by surprise as it were, and now there is a period of reflection and regathering of energy. I've been following RF's procedures on trying to make these bastards accountable, but it looks like that will fail as the courts won't go near it. At least, they'll stall until time runs out and it won't matter anymore. Two years to get it heard? That's not unthinkable. Question: when the lifting of the restrictions psyop in UK takes place and it becomes obvious that it's not what it was meant to be, how are they going to ram this down our throats? Just a new lockdown, or maybe strengthening the law against protests?

US3R109455	08-MAY-21_09:24:03	No.53127	^53125 You have to assume that we are going to be close enough to the autumn for the now standard October surprise of a winter lockdown. All the mouthpieces, from Johnson through Ferguson and on down the foodchain have assured us that it will not be happening, but of course the circumstances have yet to arise upon which they can build a case. There is the background narrative of the 'Indian variant', and we know that's a media construct because of the inability to justify any higher death figures than the current national average, and you have to bear in mind that almost a million people a month die in India, just because they have such a vast population. To try and sell the story they're using the old corroborative ploy made up of images taken from years ago relating to different stories (chemical leaks, natural disasters, traditional cremation ceremonies etc.) Anything to show dead bodies in the street. The most worrying statistic, which they've had to swallow to sell the story is that these 'deaths' have only started happening after the "vaccine" roll-out. Mention that to a media roach and watch them try to wriggle out saying 'but you said there were no excess deaths!' They won't even see the irony of what they're saying. If the principle of two steps forward and one step back is to be applied, then they might be able to forego a lockdown as long as there is a rudimentary and workable test case for the vaccine passports that we all know are coming, That, I would be fairly sure, is the endgame for this round of the operation. They'll stop then and reassess the situation, depending on how easily the 'lemming' public have agreed to go along with it.

US3R937829	08-MAY-21_09:28:21	No.53128	Look at the beginning of the downward curve on birth rates. Shocking. I keep thinking of that quote from Henry Kissinger about life being good for the survivors of a catastrophe. But what will they end up with? An isolated life of consumer junk and fast food delivered to the door? 'Safety' at the whim of an overarching tyranny, just as long as they obey the government messages on their phones? Give me liberty or give me death.
