US3R213432	24-JAN-21_09:34:23	No.51121	It is a kind of civil war within the service that's going on. Many of the highly trained professional scientists are absolutely in opposition to the political interference from the Health Authorities who have embedded government influences controlling them. You'd think that as they were 'at the top of the tree' that their own self-interest would keep them silent and playing along, but it's a measure of their true vocation that they are not. The depressing truth is that the NHS is not in the business of 'curing' anyone. Their job is to manage illness on behalf of the big pharmaceutical corporations. The great lie of 'socialized medicine' is that it is free. It is not, it never was or could be. It is the most expensive cartel of industrial chemical suppliers in the history of mankind. It is answerable to no one other than the government's own procurement services, over whom they exercise total and enduring 'influence.' Ask yourself, why is it that every other industrial chemical or technology that reaches a state of streamlined mass production suffers a gradual but huge drop in price to reflect its mass production, but not medicine? For instance there are enough diabetics in the world to bring the cost of insulin down to pennies per course, and yet the taxpayer is unaware of the fortune being handed to the cartel to maintain the fixed price. You have no idea of the extent to the self-preserving and highly complicated web of procurement services and consultants that operate in the United States and Europe. They see to it that the pharmaceutical corporations can milk the taxpayers of extra billions while keeping them unquestioning and dependent on their 'socialized medicine.' Keeping people poor also keeps them in a circle of need. They need medication to deal with physical and mental illness that is promoted by poor diet, poor lifestyle choices, poor education and increasingly poor prospects. It's not too far to say that people are kept sick, in order to provide a predictable and self-replicating customer base, forever.
US3R_FEAZO	24-JAN-21_09:39:12	No.51122	^51121 OK, I get the civil war reference now. As in all the corporate takeovers, whether it's the government services or the recent insanity of the social media technocracies, the answer is to walk away. How do you walk away from socialised medicine?
US3R213432	24-JAN-21_09:43:45	No.51123	^51122 The only damage you can do to curb the operation is to use the service as little as possible. Be responsible for your own fitness and medication of common illness. Trying to get lazy people to live a healthy lifestyle is an incredibly difficult thing to do, because they constantly put it off until tomorrow, or find an excuse to fall off the wagon and get back into bad ways. You can't easily medicate yourself for heart disease, strokes, diabetes and circulation problems, but you can cut down on the possibility of suffering from them in the first place. The less of their product you need the better. Where they don't make money is in successful operations. There's nothing in it for them if a little old lady gets her mobility back after having a hip operation, unless they can keep her dependent on future medication. As I said, there's no profit in curing people. That doesn't help to sell medicines to government.
US3R_FEAZO	24-JAN-21_09:54:02	No.51124	^51123 Cartels are hard to deal with when they have a hand in making the law. We could do with the documentation on procurement that shows there is no incentive among the suppliers to compete on price or product. The media aren't going to be saying anything, the HCQ scandal proved that surely? Alternative medicine is things like homeopathy, acupuncture and fringe stuff. Can they really ban it all?

US3R213432	24-JAN-21_09:57:22	No.51125	Can they ban it? Only if they know about it. Look out for new laws brought in by the 'pandemic' that regulates alternative medicine as a threat to public health. They'll leverage the mob against any competition they want to remove, encouraging the idea that it's harming the health service and the general public with 'misinformation.'
US3R_FEAZO	24-JAN-21_10:01:34	No.51126	A return to the 'far right conspiracy theory' narrative? Labelling everyone a wacko who points out what the government and their cronies are doing. It's Bill Gates 101.
