US3R_ZOSER	10-JAN-21_03:33:12	No.7943	Everyone is aware now of the purge. America is leading the way, not just with the banning of accounts on the controlled social media, but the takedown of independent platforms through the manipulation of the country's infrastructure. Parler is 'gone' from the regular means of communication, Gab is likely the next. I'm disappointed that they have not made provisional back-up business plans for what they knew was undoubtedly coming, but they would argue that the business model was not yet large enough for that kind of instant redundancy.
			The in-joke amongst the corporations has always been that if they don't like the platform, they should build their own. Then when the platform is banned, they say build your own server farm. When their business model is deplatformed by the online financial transactors, they say build your own international banking system, etc.
			This is how Random Skies proposed that the 'darknet' was born. Not out of entities hiding from the light because they wanted to do nefarious and illegal things, but out of carriers of the light looking to illuminate a place in the darkness. In fact, the 'darknet' of the Random Skies series was named by the new world tyranny to besmirch the name of truth seekers in history. It is the same as calling somebody who investigates an official story, a 'conspiracy theorist.' It is a slur meant to detract the uninquisitive from discovering the truth.
			America is now reaping the whirlwind. The generation that grew up in the shadow of JFK's death failed to enquire deeply enough. They chose to consume, to party, to liberally erode the values and laws that protected their way of life and gave birth to them in the first place. Their children, the millennials, had no chance. There was no economy left for them to inherit, the wealth had long since been stolen, and their education was subverted by a public school system that completely intellectually disarmed them. They were fed to the beast.
			Despite attempts to take this platform offline, it is basically impregnable, due to its structure. Sure, there is a plan by Facebook's vassal companies Instagram and WhatsApp to subvert the identification system by introducing, from February, a demand that Facebook has access to the complete contents of your device. Their hope is to be able to mine your contacts list and triangulate exactly who is talking to whom, and therefore who is saying what on the Larp Rising (and other) darknet platforms. Unlike Parler, we are way ahead of them, and have discontinued the use of 'end to end encrypted' platforms such as Instagram and WhatsApp for formal identification and anonymisation. We have a new independent platform, that has no connection to big tech. Invited professionals will always be able to find a way here, and your data will always be safe. You will choose what you share, when and with whom.
			The Random Skies team tell us that www.randomskies.com could be taken down at any time, as they are not currently running on their own servers through a Reach backbone. Some darknet posts are rerouted to the general public through The Switching Station, if they are deemed relevant to Random Skies, but they are independently posted and in no way affect our operation. The first sign will be if the Random Skies series of novels is delisted by Amazon, and they start selling directly through the website. After that the battle against the ISPs will be their own, and we will do what we can to help spread the word. Remember, what happens in America, comes to Europe shortly afterwards. Brexit never happened, America has fallen, and there is a storm gathering on the horizon. Good luck everybody.
